Category:Computer-related introductions in 1999Q: Relative and isolated routes for ASP.NET MVC I have a strong preference for relative routes. For example: /account/Login /account/Logout Is there any way to achieve relative routes while retaining my own existing routing code? Obviously a solution may consist of "merging" the 2 routes together, but this is not acceptable for my project because I have a bunch of routers for supporting sub-domains and all that. A: An alternative to merging routes is to create a custom route that handles the cases of "/Account/Login" and "/Account/Logout" and routes them elsewhere as needed. For example: routes.MapRoute("PublicRoutes", // Route name "{applicationName}/Login", // URL with parameters new { controller = "Account", action = "Login", applicationName = @"\w+" }, // Parameter defaults new { controller = "Account", action = "Logout", applicationName = @"\w+" } // Constraints); routes.MapRoute("PublicRoutes", // Route name "{applicationName}/Logout", // URL with parameters new { controller = "Account", action = "Logout", applicationName = @"\w+" }, // Parameter defaults new { controller = "Account", action = "Login", applicationName = @"\w+" } // Constraints); Then you should have a single route that routes everything else (assuming you don't have the same constraints on "/Account/Login" and "/Account/Logout"): routes.MapRoute("Default", "{controller}/{action}", new { controller = "Account", action = "Login" }, // Parameter defaults new { controller = "Account", action = "Logout" } // Constraints); Bioavailability of the nonaromatic phenolic phytoestrogen genistein in normal men. Genistein (GEN) is the most active isoflavone isolated from soybeans, and has been shown to be ba244e880a
