The insulator-insulator method is a method for disposing a plurality of three-dimensional articles by forming an outer frame-shaped insulator around the plurality of three-dimensional articles to prevent the plurality of three-dimensional articles from peeling and adhering to each other. In the insulator-insulator method, a lower structure and an upper structure are disposed through fusion bonding between the outer frame-shaped insulator and the plurality of three-dimensional articles, and the plurality of three-dimensional articles is sequentially laminated while the lower structure and the upper structure are bonded to each other. This method is called an "insulator-insulator method" because the plurality of three-dimensional articles are disposed one by one on the plurality of inner frames of the outer frame-shaped insulator. The outer frame-shaped insulator can be manufactured through fusion bonding without using the technology for forming the plurality of three-dimensional articles. Therefore, the outer frame-shaped insulator has a large range of selection. For example, the outer frame-shaped insulator can be manufactured by using a kind of material that cannot be heated at a relatively low temperature or that is difficult to be damaged by fusion bonding. The outer frame-shaped insulator can be manufactured by using a material having a relatively large size or by using a thin-wall member. As the outer frame-shaped insulator, for example, JP-A-2000-250554 discloses an insulated panel (wedge unit) in which a wide and flat heat insulator, a narrow and flat heat insulator
