Is it considered an anti-pattern to specify a component's ID in the render() method rather than in a class property, for example (based on this answer): class App extends React.Component { render() { return ( ) } } If not, why? A: Its a good pattern to use Id's unless you have a per state scenario. The example you posted is the same as the way it should be done. Since the application is stateless, the component should be able to be reused. If you leave the ID's in the render method as you have done, whenever that component is rendered with a new ID, it will re-render. Instead using state would make more sense. not deny that the inquiry is a reasonable one in limited circumstances. But there may be no easy way to proceed when a plaintiff is a foreigner, where it is unclear whether there was a "lawful cause of action" in the first place, and where the issue of damages is unclear. It is not at all clear that the Central Bank would be barred from bringing a damages action against these defendants, an issue that is not central to the general principles of preemption. It may also be true that, as a practical matter, there is nothing left of the Central Bank's case. If the Central Bank is barred from bringing any suit in the matter of allegedly unlawful activities in connection with the Domestic Account, then it has no case against the defendants. 26 The discussion in the majority opinion is peculiar because it proceeds on the assumption that Swiss choice of law rules are irrelevant. They have in fact long been respected under this circuit's jurisprudence, and this is not a case in which recent Supreme Court decisions have overturned such precedents. See, e.g., Prime Ins.
