“We've seen a large increase in one-on-one situations, especially between center backs and midfield players. It's vital that these one-on-one battles are tight and accurate. This technology allows us to add improvements to the on-ball action to deliver increased accuracy and responsiveness.” – New York Cosmos Head of Soccer Operations, Giovanni Savarese You can learn more about the technology behind HyperMotion Technology on the video below.

The future of academic medicine, and the future of the doctor-in-training. The transformation of medical education has been a gradual process. The development of the modern medical curriculum, initially mandated by the Flexner Report of 1910, led to a radical shift in the clinical experiences of medical students and the inclusion of basic science learning. In the post-Flexner era, the focus has been on the development of a curriculum that combines clinical and basic science learning into a single journey culminating in the acquisition of the title of physician. This basic structure must be supported with the evolution of the role of the medical student through a progression from patient care to research, as well as the development of innovative educational methods. In addition, there is a dire need to address the future of medical education in a time of medical reform and an impending shortage of physicians. Medical education has evolved into a complex structure with emphasis on the structures, and little attention paid to the processes that constitute the workings of the structure. In an attempt to clarify this structural organization, and the role that the process of medical education plays in the overall success, there is a need to address the role that the graduate (from medical school to residency), the physician (as a primary care provider), and the patient (the ultimate recipient of health care) play in the overall structure. We conclude with recommendations as to how we should approach and design medical education in the future.
