The result is a more realistic, fully interactive game. The new engine allows players to move naturally as they would on the pitch. With increased agility and acceleration, players handle the ball more intuitively, use dynamic feints and turns, and even execute complex dribbling and passing moves. The Movements engine also models individual, team and brand-specific movement data from real-life players, including dribbling, passing, feints, and timing. The new engine allows players to move naturally as they would on the pitch. Players can move faster with better acceleration and more agility. Furthermore, the engine allows teams to use their individual movement data in order to strategize with a new artificial intelligence, and guide players to positions on the pitch and give them the right skills and instructions. READ: FIFA 20 introduces Body Control as gameplay improvement for all FIFA modes including Online “HyperMotion Technology is a technological breakthrough that we believe will forever change the way FIFA is played,” said Peter Eriksson, EA SPORTS FIFA 22 Lead Gameplay Designer. “Most of us have played FIFA since we were kids and it was a huge bonus for us to be able to play the game a couple of years ago, and with the new Movements engine, we are getting to play for real, with greater agility, quicker movement, and more natural camera angles. Combined with the powerful in-game engine and a wide range of new features like Dynamic Tactics, Player Radar, and User Interaction, FIFA 22 is the most significant new FIFA game ever. We can’t wait to play it ourselves in the next couple of months, and I’m sure our thousands of fans will join us.” New User Interaction features include: New Player Radar: Navigate the pitch and the game with the new Player Radar. With this feature, players can instantly see important things happening around them using contextual information. With the new Player Radar, players can read the direction of an opponent, see their location relative to the pitch (if their movement is restricted), and more. New Tactics: You can give your players control of the pitch in a new, more tactical way. With this, you can now use Dynamic Tactics to change where players are and where the pitch is at any given time. In a match, it allows players to focus their energy and improve their tactical timing in different areas of the pitch. From spacing through defense and attack, to controlling a
