However, in the current study, it was clear from the data that the severe and atypical social behavior of the RP macaques was due to the influence of the prolonged period of isolation and the high proportion of them that had never become dominant. Social isolation of animals is said to be the most extreme model of stress in most species of laboratory animal, and it is also a potent precipitating factor in the development of schizophrenia-like symptoms (Schneider and Christopoulos, [@B25]). It was established that RP macaques became increasingly agitated in the early period of the isolation. This may be a consequence of a loss of attachment of the baby macaques to the mother, or a consequence of a loss of attachment to the social companions. The change from animals that were group-housed but were not part of the dominant group to those that were kept in isolation and became the socially isolated group occurred within a few days. Moreover, it was also clear that those animals that became the socially isolated group had had less opportunity for social learning during the group-housing period. This was because most of them were social misfits in the group: they were excluded from the group by some of the group-mates and became anxious as a result. Once the isolated group was formed, the number of aggressive animals was increased and the sociability was decreased. It was clear from the behavioral observations that the animals in the socially isolated group were not socially comfortable and it can be suggested that the RP group of macaques was a stressed group, even though the animals were not physically or mentally ill. Isolation seems to be the major effector in the
