Note There are several items in this book that are best learned by doing, such as creating templates or drawing out and drawing upon topographical maps. So, with that in mind, I did my best to make these exercises clear and easy. However, if you want to learn just how to use these tools without doing them, then this book will give you a good head start. # WHAT'S IN THIS BOOK In this book, you'll get a number of projects to work on. In some cases, it will be a fairly straightforward task to complete the project, but in other cases, you'll have to put in some hours, meaning you'll have to work on the project beyond the book's text. In these cases, you'll have to read the book, set up your work environment, and experiment. In short, you'll need to actually use the software, and all the exercises along the way will help you get there. Chapter 1 explains the basics of working with digital imagery, and Chapter 2 explains the basics of working with vector graphic software. In Chapter 3, I

Google vs. Samsung: Android, Chrome, and the “Intellectual Property Advantage” In September of last year, Google and Samsung came to an agreement regarding a number of patent infringements committed by Google as well as a number of the company’s products, namely: Nexus 7 and Nexus 10 tablets, the Android operating system, the Google Play store, and Chromebooks. Each side was granted a series of concessions and some licences under the terms of the agreement. However, some members of the Android community remained wary, believing that Google had reached the agreement in order to appease its manufacturers, while others, notably rival phone manufacturers, were pleased with the results. One clear example of this is the likelihood that Samsung will continue to support its proprietary Samsung Galaxy line of smartphones and tablets with respect to developing Google’s services, and vice-versa. Many feel that Samsung will continue to make the Android operating system and update its devices to incorporate new features as the company did prior to October 5th last year, as well as in the last two years. As such, Google has been keeping the development of its Android operating system in house while Samsung continues to release Galaxy based devices, both of which employ the Android OS, albeit with very different code. There is also the idea that Samsung will eventually port its proprietary Tizen operating system to its Galaxy devices, as it did with the Galaxy Gear smartwatch. Furthermore, this is backed up by the fact that the Galaxy S6 and S6 Edge smartphones launched at IFA last year were already running Tizen. The underlying secret to the success of the Tizen OS, is that Samsung has tried to design the framework as a series of protocols, or APIs, to ensure developers are able to more easily interface with its hardware. In particular, the S6 and S6 Edge smartphones were able to succeed by utilizing the Near Field Communications (NFC) protocol. This same technology was also used in the Galaxy Gear smartwatch and can play a pivotal role in mobile payments. A further example of this can be seen when Linked-In recently rolled out its new standalone login, which is designed to function via NFC. A year later and here we are again. This time, both Samsung and Google are actively seeking to negotiate and agree upon the terms of a renewed deal, which looks set to go ahead prior to the deadline of September 30th. What’s all this about? Well, as this article explores, Google has been

THERE’S something exhilarating about being unemployed. No longer bound by the time-consumingness of paid work, you are free to do what you want. So what to do? Nigel Worthington, the director of careers advice at the University of Buckingham, suggests registering with a charity or church to volunteer for a couple of hours a week, and for two hours a month, registering with a professional body as a member of a committee that involves money or decision making, like a pension fund, care trust or youth centre. He also likes the idea of a concerted campaign, like those that have been run to encourage people to volunteer after retirement. The end of the traditional career enables people to think differently about what they do. The question of whether they continue to earn a living is reduced, and it may be as well, says Mr Worthington: “When you’re retired, you’re not there to earn a living for yourself, so it’s an ideal time to do other things.” The trouble is that it is hard to find something you are prepared to do for only a couple of hours a week when, in practice, you will find yourself suddenly with free time on your hands. A handful of self-selecting charities make an effort to match volunteers with causes. Others advertise positions, and sometimes sponsor a volunteer to go to a conference or seminar and gain experience. The University of Buckingham’s career advisers have been campaigning recently for a volunteer register to be developed, and it is possible to download one. “It’s not much use unless people share their ideas on how they like to volunteer and where they want to go with their volunteering,” says Mr Worthington. One organisation that has seen volunteers benefit from regular contact with one another is Roots & Shoots UK. Founded in 2002 by Sue Hunter, a former head of business development at the Royal Television Society, it is the largest international network of volunteer organisations in the world, with 90,000 members. Roots & Shoots coordinates local groups of 20-30 people who meet once a month for dinner in different countries. Though there are no qualifications to join, the organisation helps members develop their skills in a chosen area, such as the environment. “I had been studying journalism. It was becoming a bit of a chore, and I had this sort of nagging feeling I was being pressured, that I was
