To determine the role of frequency, intensity, and duration of sound exposure in the development of temporary threshold shift (TTS) in humans. A controlled cohort study. A private audiology laboratory. Standardized acoustic trauma was produced in 75 normal-hearing individuals using a one-octave band of noise centered at 3 kHz delivered at either an intensity of 10 or 120 dB(A) for 10 consecutive minutes, and the noise was repeated with an interval of 3, 6, or 9 days. The TTS, as the difference between the average pre-exposure threshold and the average threshold value at 1 day or 1 week or 3 months after exposure. TTS was calculated for each ear and plotted against the individual average sound pressure levels (SPLs) and the peak SPLs. TTS developed in response to all 3 levels of exposure. SPLs with the minimum time between exposures (6 days) showed greater threshold shift showed the largest correlation to the peak exposure (r = 0.52, p 0.05). A daily dose of 3 times the minimum threshold level of sound provided an effective dose for TTS within 1 week. There was no correlation between threshold shift and duration of exposure or time to recovery. \(\price{\pi} \) \(\pr
