With development of mobile terminals such as PDAs and mobile phones, advanced application programs (hereinafter referred to as applications) are widely used in these mobile terminals. In particular, when a user of a mobile terminal accesses the Internet by using a web browser, it is required to install an application suitable for the user. In the case where a general application is installed, the user is capable of immediately using the application. On the other hand, when an application program specialized in a particular function such as a search engine is installed, the user has to use the installed application program to perform a search process. In this case, since the application installed in the mobile terminal can directly provide only a few functions, the user has to directly select an application program for the application. In other words, the user cannot use a plurality of application programs at the same time. Therefore, the user is required to select, depending on an intended application program, an applications to be installed in the mobile terminal. However, if an existing application is selected from among the applications in view of user demand, the user may not know other applications capable of performing a particular function. Therefore, the user may have difficulty in selecting an appropriate application, resulting in a problem in which a suitable application is not selected for use. RELATED
