XmlDocument.The present invention relates to thermal insulation. Thermal insulation is used in many settings to try to improve thermal efficiency. Various materials have been employed for a variety of purposes. For instance, polymers such as neoprene have been used for years in such settings as thermal insulation for appliances. Other types of insulation have been used in the past. For instance, cementitious products have been used to insulate pipes and buildings. However, each material has certain drawbacks when used in specific applications. In some cases, the use of such materials may be cost prohibitive and may be of limited effectiveness. It would be useful to have a thermal insulation that is effective, easy and cost effective to manufacture, and durable for many applications.Recurrence of arterial ischemic strokes. The risk of recurrent ischemic stroke is a function of the initial stroke severity, the elapsed time since onset of the first ischemic episode, and the presence of underlying vascular risk factors. In the majority of patients, however, further strokes occur in areas remote from the initial ischemic site. In patients with a hemispheric stroke, risk is highest in the first few days, coinciding with an initial fall in blood pressure. In contrast, in patients with a lacunar infarction, risk remains high for up to 6 months after the event. The risk of recurrence after an ischemic stroke is
